

What Types of Health Coverage Are Available?

Rising health-care costs have driven the demand for, and the price of, medical insurance sky-high. The availability of group coverage through employment has helped many Americans face such costs. However, people who are not currently covered by their employers have few affordable sources for group coverage currently. However, as a result of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, state and/or regional exchanges will offer coverage to individuals and some small businesses.

Individuals seeking medical coverage on their own can explore purchasing an individual health insurance policy. And those aged 65 and older may qualify for Medicare coverage.

There are three general classifications of medical insurance plans: fee-for-service (indemnity), managed care (e.g., HMOs and PPOs), and high-deductible health plan (HDHP).

Fee for Service

With a basic fee-for-service (indemnity) insurance plan, health-care providers (such as physicians, nurse practitioners, surgery centers, and hospitals) are paid a fee for each service provided to insured patients.

Indemnity plans normally cover hospitalization, outpatient care, and physician services in or out of the hospital. You select the health-care provider for consultation or treatment. You are then billed for the service and reimbursed by the insurance company, or you can “assign” direct payment to the provider from the insurance company. Indemnity plans typically require the payment of premiums, deductibles, and coinsurance. Limits on certain coverage or exclusions may apply. Lifetime limits on benefits are prohibited as are limits on annual benefits.

Managed Care

Managed-care plans became popular in the 1990s as a way to help rein in rising medical costs. In managed-care plans, insurance companies contract with a network of health-care providers to provide cost-effective health care. Managed-care plans include health maintenance organizations (HMOs), preferred provider organizations (PPOs), and point-of-service (POS) plans.

Health maintenance organization. A HMO operates as a prepaid health-care plan. You normally pay a monthly premium in addition to a small copayment for a visit to a physician, who may be on staff or contracted by the HMO. Copayments for visits to specialists may be higher. The insurance company typically covers the amount over the patient copayment amount.

Each covered member chooses or is assigned a primary-care physician from doctors in the plan. This person acts as a gatekeeper for his or her patients and, if deemed necessary, can refer patients to specialists who are on the HMO's list of providers. Because HMOs contract with health-care providers, costs are typically lower than in indemnity plans.

Preferred provider organization. A PPO is a managed-care organization of physicians, hospitals, clinics, and other health-care providers who contract with an insurance company to provide health care at reduced rates to individuals insured in the plan. The insurance company uses actuarial tables to determine "reasonable and customary" fees for each type of service, and health-care providers accept the PPO's fee schedule and guidelines.

The insured can see any health-care provider within a preferred network of providers and pays a copayment for each visit. Insured individuals have to meet an annual deductible before the insurance company will start covering health-care services. Typically, the insurance company will pay a high percentage (often 80%) of the costs to the plan's health-care providers after the deductible has been met, and patients pay the balance.

Although insured individuals can choose providers outside the plan without permission, patient out-of-pocket costs will be higher; for example, the initial deductible for each visit is higher and the percentage of covered costs by the insurance company will be lower. Because PPOs provide more patient flexibility than HMOs, they may cost a little more.

Point-of-service plan. A POS health-care plan mixes aspects of a PPO and HMO to allow greater patient autonomy. POS plans also use a network of preferred providers whom patients must turn to first and from whom patients receive referrals to other providers if deemed necessary. POS plans recommend that patients choose a personal physician from inside the network. The personal physician can refer patients to other physicians and specialists who are inside or outside the network. Insurance companies have a national network of approved providers, so insured individuals can receive services throughout the United States. Copays tend to be lower for a POS plan than for a PPO plan.

High-Deductible Health Plan

A HDHP provides comprehensive coverage for high-cost medical bills and is usually combined with a health-reimbursement arrangement that enables participants to build savings to pay for future medical expenses. HDHP plans generally cover preventive care in full with a small (or no) deductible or copayment. However, these plans have higher annual deductibles and out-of-pocket limits than other insurance plans.

Participants enrolled in a HDHP can open a health savings account (HSA) to save money that can be used for current and future medical expenses. There are annual limits on how much can be invested in a HSA. The funds can be invested as you choose, and any interest and earnings accumulate tax deferred. HSA funds can be withdrawn free of income tax and penalties provided the money is spent on qualified health-care expenses for the participant and his or her spouse and dependent children.

Remember that the cost and availability of an individual health insurance policy can depend on factors such as age, health (pre-existing conditions), and the type of insurance purchased. In addition, a physical examination may be required.

Medicare

Medicare is the U.S. government's health-care insurance program for the elderly. It is available to eligible people aged 65 and older as well as certain disabled persons. Part A provides basic coverage for hospital care as well as limited skilled nursing care, home health care, and hospice care. Part B covers physicians' services, inpatient and outpatient medical services, and diagnostic tests. Part D prescription drug coverage is also available.

Medicare Advantage is a type of privately run insurance that includes Medicare-approved HMOs, PPOs, fee-for-service plans, and special needs plans. Some plans offer prescription drug coverage. To join a Medicare Advantage plan, you must have Medicare Part A and Part B and you have to pay the monthly Medicare Part B premium to Medicare, as well as the Medicare Advantage premium.

Medicare Supplement Insurance, or Medigap, is sold by private insurance companies and is designed to cover the deductibles and copayments that Medicare doesn't cover. At one point, there were more than 200 different policies available. Then the National Association of Insurance Commissioners stepped in and created 10 standard packages of coverage, designated by the letters A through J. Since June 2010, plans E, H, I, and J have not been sold, although you are able to keep your plan if you already had one of these plans before June 2010. There are also two new policies (plans M and N) that offer different benefits and premiums. Plans D and G bought on or after June 1, 2010, have different benefits than D and G plans bought before June 1, 2010 (although the benefits won't change for those who participated in these plans prior to June 1). Only Medigap insurers are able to offer these plans. Although each standardized plan is identical from insurer to insurer, prices may differ and all these plans may not be available in every state.

Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act

In June 2010, Congress passed the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act. Many of the provisions have already been implemented, including the law's individual health-care mandate.

Basically, most individuals who are not covered by employer-sponsored health insurance, Medicare, Medicaid, or another government program will be required to have "minimum essential coverage" or pay an annual penalty. The penalty assessed is the greater of a flat dollar amount or a percentage of modified adjusted gross income. Taxpayers who claim dependents on their tax returns will be subject to the penalty for each dependent who does not have coverage, although college students and minors under age 18 would be subject to only 50 percent of the penalty.

Since 2010, as a result of the health-reform act, adult children up to age 26 have been eligible for dependent coverage under their parents' health insurance plans provided they are not eligible for their own employer-based coverage. Insurance companies are no longer able to refuse coverage for children (under age 19) with pre-existing conditions nor can adults with pre-existing conditions be rejected or charged higher premiums.

The information in this article is not intended to be tax or legal advice, and it may not be relied on for the purpose of avoiding any federal tax penalties. You are encouraged to seek tax or legal advice from an independent professional advisor. The content is derived from sources believed to be accurate. Neither the information presented nor any opinion expressed constitutes a solicitation for the purchase or sale of any security. This material was written and prepared by Emerald. © 2015 Emerald Connect, LLC